PTEN inhibition reduces cell proliferation, increases apoptosis, and decreases cell migration.

This data concludes that inhibition of PTEN not only increases the rate of cellular proliferation in both the interfollicular and follicular regions, but also shows no signs of uncontrolled growth. Overall, these results support the possibility of therapeutic use of PTEN for facilitating cellular proliferation in the epidermis.

Acknowledgements

Thank you to the pathways program for giving me the opportunity to do research. I am passionate about during my dental education. No funding was needed for this project.

References

Acknowledgements

Thank you to the pathways program for giving me the opportunity to do research. I am passionate about during my dental education. No funding was needed for this project.